COLLECTION SUMMARY

Title: Convict Hard Labor Collection

Dates: 1897-1933 Quantity: 1 cubic foot

Identification:

Abstract: During the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Alabama generated a significant portion of its revenue, close to ten percent, from the leasing of convicts to individuals and corporations. Because companies had no vested interest in convicts, viewing them only as a cheap source of easily discarded and replaced labor, the conditions were often deplorable and prisoners were routinely beaten for low productivity. Furthermore, because the demand for convict labor was so high, an unusually high number of cases tried resulted in sentences to hard labor. The judges justified hard labor as a means of repaying court costs associated with trying a prisoner. Common charges resulting in hard labor were larceny, assault, vagrancy, riding a train without a ticket, and adultery, or fornication. Although the convict leasing system existed prior to the Civil War, many Southern states used it to circumvent the thirteenth amendment. Not surprisingly, a disproportionate number of African Americans were sentenced to hard labor. Bowing to pressure from activist groups enraged over poor working conditions and prisoner deaths, the Alabama legislature officially banned the practice of convict leasing on July 1, 1928, becoming the last state to do so.

Processing Information

The archives received the documents within the collection scattered throughout several boxes. There was no original order and many of the documents were loose at the onset of processing. The processor grouped similar items together, placing all documents within acid free folders and storage containers. Furthermore, all metal fasteners were removed from the documents. The Prisoner Feed Bills were too large to fit completely inside the folders, and the processor believed they might become damaged by the weight of the other folders. Therefore, they were removed from the rest of the collection and placed in their own box. With the exceptions of minor tears, slight discoloration from age, and rust spots from old metal fasteners, the collection is in excellent condition.
